What are Mycorrhizal Fungi?

"Mycorrhizae" literally means "fungus"- "root" and defines the mutually beneficial relationship between plants and these specialized fungi. The fungi colonize plant roots and extend microscopic filaments into the surrounding soil profile, greatly enhancing the effective surface area of the root system.

More than 90 percent of plant species form a symbiotic relationship with these types of beneficial soil fungi. Over 70 percent of plant species, including most common vegetables, flowers, fruits, grasses and agricultural crops, form endomycorrhizal relationships. Endomycorrhizae penetrate into plant roots, delivering nutrients directly. A smaller percentage of species, including the most popular conifers and oaks, form ectomycorrhizal relationships. Ectomycorrhizae live in close proximity to, but outside, plant roots.

When applying these products, the objective is to ensure physical contact between the existing or emerging plant roots and the inoculant. By utilizing a robust mix of beneficial soil organisms, plants can survive and thrive the way they naturally evolved.
